In opening his highly interesting and marked that Rooseveit seemed hardly a subject to speak about at a socialist brought him quite near the socialist party, he was likely to be on the edge of the party for the rest of his life. The speaker can rapidly over the chief events of Roosevelt's life, showing the ceaseless and boundless scope of his activities. The Columbus speech, he said, had come as such a bombshell dropped into the conservative camp thrown the ex-president over to the socialists, and in their ignorance of socialism they describe Roosevelt's utterances at Columbus as socialism.

Professor Smith claimed that every radical statement of Roosevelt is issued with a string to it, in the position of a continual balance from one side to the other. Socialism wants to democratize industry, but it cin't see any other way to do it except by the elimination of the capitalist where Roosevelt and socialism part in one essential point, for, said the speaker, you can't have a democracy even problem, and if there were no other reasons than this for the formation of capitallistic class. Professor Smith spoke of the way the workers in Engiand have gone into politics with their economic questions, and are a power to be respected, and he said that the workers here ought to combine for the same purpose. He professed that he didn't know just how much was to be expected to be gained through legislative means or just how day, when Rev.
